Shopping here toiling away there- Global links between consumption and working conditions

Whether clothing, food, electrical goods, cell phones or other goods - the downside of the desire for cheap products is hardly considered.

Cheap production is made possible by poor pay and bad working conditions. In the "factories for the world market" mostly female workers are suffering from working hours of up to 90 hours per week, unpaid overtime or sexual assault.

In addition our consumer habits are actually driving climate change and water insecurity. A study found that the production and use of household goods and services was responsible for 60 percent of global greenhouse gas emissions.

It takes a different approach to consumption and pressure from consumers to change this. Fair trade, fair procurement and consumer criticism are important starting points here.

In this seminar, we will

- use examples from clothing and computer industries to examine the connections between consumption and the globalized world of work
- ask for alternatives and how they can be implemented
- consider how we can change our own consumption behavior
